One-Minute Reflections

Description: Students write one thing they learned about the story being watched and reflect on it with this prompt question:

What does “winning” in life look like to me—and is that vision truly mine?

Assessment Focus: Self-reflection and internal feedback loops.

The teacher may ask some students to share their thoughts with the class.

Journal Types/ Journaling Techniques

Journaling is a tool for personal growth. It boosts creativity and enhances the processing of thoughts and feelings that may lead to tracking life’s goals and progress. The teacher will introduce the various types of journals or journaling techniques to students, giving them windows as to the various options they may choose when starting to write their own journals.

The teacher may present more examples and real-life situations where these types of journals can be used for such intent.

situations and scenarios where students should be able to provide the correct type of journal

- Reflective Journaling
Scenario: You submitted an essay you worked hard on but received lower marks than expected along with detailed feedback. You felt disappointed at first but later reviewed the feedback carefully.
- Gratitude Journaling
Scenario: You were feeling overwhelmed or upset, and a friend noticed and reached out to check on you—even with just a kind message or small gesture.
- Dream Journaling
Scenario: You dreamed of standing on a stage getting an award, seeing your artwork in a gallery, or getting accepted into your dream college.
- Art Journaling
Scenario: You experienced a meaningful moment—a great trip, a holiday, or a meaningful conversation—that you want to remember. (Create a visual memory journal page using pictures, objects (like ticket stubs), or drawings to capture the feeling and details of that moment.)
- Travel Journaling

time, it also takes up Reflective Instruction since students use their critical thinking skills and decision making in connecting the correct situation and scenario to the type of journal that should be made.

The teacher may also infuse questions that would solicit possible journal prompts from students. In this way, students will be able to develop questions that would guide them in writing such journals.

Students will answer these questions alternately with their partner and will have 5 minutes to do the activity. A personal journal must be written reflecting their thoughts and takeaways gathered from the responses of their partner. Question Prompts: | Collaboration with other students in classroom activities have proven to demonstrate students’ creativity. Thus, in this activity sharing of thoughts and opinions with other learners not only boosts the self-esteem of students but it embraces open-mindedness as they will be confronted with various views other than the ones they have. This reflects Relevant Instruction and Reflective Instruction. Relevant in the sense that it makes learning meaningful as it connects to real situations and students shall tailor their journal entries to the thoughts and views gathered from the activity. It is reflective because it gives the skill and ability of students to use their critical thinking skills. |
